

A Answer.—He asked me if I had married John G. Pendleton. I told him I had not. He said he would like to see me at Pendleton's office and give me an introduction. I told him I would like very much to do so, but that it was no farther from my house than his. He [Pendleton] called that day and that; he [Pendleton] wanted to make my acquaintance. I went there and he did not think of it until Robert E. Lee called his attention to the necessity of my coming. Earnshaw further said that W. B. Akitt, an old man was out in our country, and that he had been taking down notes and cutting and tearing up things generally and go home. Earnshaw said that he was in a position to make it to the interest and wanted me to meet him [Earnshaw] in the postoffice building, which was in the afternoon. I went there and found him sitting around, but did not see anything more of Earnshaw since.

Q And you thought he was the subject was in approaching you in this manner?

A Yes, sir; he could have been anybody else, and that was what
